Good Manners part 1

This term I am going to write a series of articles on Good Manners. A mentor of mine on Behaviour Education, Wilson McCaskill, describes Good Manners as “the lubricant of our social machinery”. He continues by saying that the “faster the parts of the social machinery turn, the better the lubricant must be.” What he means is that Good Manners help us to interact and connect in all areas of life with reduced friction and improved outcomes. It seems though that Good Manners have become a casualty of today's lifestyle. The usual explanation is that we don't have the time for such pleasantries.

Role models of good manners are careful to use please and thank you where appropriate, and to request rather than demand, they add finesse by using vocal tones that are respectful, while making eye contact to reveal interest. In my many years in education, I know that well-mannered classrooms are calmer, with the students more aware and sensitive to the needs of each other.

The children and teachers feel happy, safe, calm and cohesive. People talk about the school having ‘a nice feel’. The teachers enjoy teaching and don't want to leave. The parents are relieved they have found a ‘good school’. Everyone seems to be pulling in the same direction and the Principal encapsulates the whole experience by saying, “I've got great kids, great staff and great parents.” This remark would seem to indicate some kind of mutually supportive relationship between all three parties.
